Soberano, Porrassen y Escritos. Universitario.[Secondary atelectasis. Anatomical, clinical and diagnostic aspects]. The anatomical and physiological peculiarities of the large airways of the upper and lower respiratory tract have been demonstrated by means of a series of bronchoscopies on post-mortem material. These findings have been taken into account when assessing secondary atelectasis of lobar or segmental level. They suggest: 1) the transudative component of the pulmonary oedema at its beginning. 2) the phenomenon of the oedema-ventilation relationship. 3) the effect of the pressure of the pulmonary oedema on the calibre of the bronchioles. 4) the existence of a sort of reflex inhibition of ventilation on the part of the airways. These observations are set into some clinical perspective. error Occ13bf012

But the query results will be NULL for about 15% of the rows. Is it fine to ignore those rows and proceed with the rest, or is there any best practice for this? A: This is called NULLIF in T-SQL: SELECT * FROM mytable WHERE colA = NULLIF(@param1, NULL) Syntax: SELECT * FROM mytable WHERE colA = @param1; or, if you wish to avoid code generation: DECLARE @param1 VARCHAR(100) = NULL; SELECT * FROM mytable WHERE colA = @param1; or, more simply, as suggested by @PeterS: SELECT * FROM mytable WHERE colA IS NULL; Visualization of the
