A titanium biomaterial with heparin immobilized by a combinatorial polycondensation/polymerisation technique was prepared. The presence of heparin was detected by a novel investigation strategy based on molecular dynamics simulations and was found to be correctly distributed in the polymer network. The specific heparin molecular interaction with the biomaterial was identified by FT-IR spectroscopy and X-ray photoelectron spectroscopy. Biological assays showed that the biomaterial supported cell adhesion and proliferation. Therefore, the fabrication of an advanced biomaterial embedded with biologically active molecule should be of great importance for the improvement of the biomaterials of potential application in orthopaedics and dentistry.Redescription of Histrionidium simile Herrman, 1929 (Squamata: Iguanidae) and new records from south-eastern Brazil. The lizard genus Histrionidium Skurroff, 1975 comprises two species: H. campanella Herrman, 1929 from the West Indies, H. simile Herrman, 1929 and H. cupulifera Fehér, 1984 from South America. Histrionidium simile is frequently confused with H. cupulifera, a species known from two regions in Brazil (central and south). We redescribed this species and supplemented our findings with a molecular study, confirming the existence of at least two distinct species with a long geographical distribution in southern Brazil. Our results show that H. simile could be considered a widely distributed species in southern Brazil, while H. cupulifera is restricted to eastern South America.Proposal for a continuous
