To do this I wrote the following code: delete(A, B, P, A):-(+ (member((A,B), P) ; -(member((A,B), P)) ; member((A,B), P)).I've checked the syntax and values, but the "0" register never changes even though I perform the code. It is defined in "A" and "B" like this: A = [x2,0,x3,x4]; B = [0,x5,x6,x7]; Any ideas what is wrong here? Thanks A: You could use the findall/3 predicate which is standard in Prolog and would work in the following way: delete(A, B, P, A) :- findall(X, (member((A,B), P), member((A,B), X)). So it gives you a relation of X-to-P, where X is a tuple that consists of the same elements as the list P, except the element (A,B). This predicate could then be used for deleting. Recently, personal computers and home-use game devices, for example, have been advancing in function and integration. Thus, an increasing number of devices are equipped with a touch panel as an input device, which provides a user interface to input information by causing the display of the information on a display unit to be changed in response to the pressure of a finger or the like. An example of such a device equipped with the touch panel is illustrated in e79caf774b

Do you want to really stand out in a crowded sea of competitors? Should your brand remain consistent, or evolve into something truly different and new? Most marketers define a unique position for their brand at least once a year and will often decide on annual brand strategies. It is a time when the brand can be re-energized and set a new trend by introducing a new look, new messaging, or a new product. If a brand's values and personality are strong, the brand will remain strong in the market. If marketers have trouble with these things, they should focus on two things: Quality and Trends. First, if there are problems with your products, they should focus on quality, then work from there. Second, if there are changes that can be made to the brand, they should focus on trends. Think of trends as what consumers want, and what consumers will buy. Focusing on trends is a more forward-looking approach, and it is typically not as reactive as focusing on quality, as you would only make this decision when things have already gone wrong. Key Trends that can be predicted and used to grow brands are: Faster-Selling Items Trends come in all sizes. Some are small, and don't require a big change in approach. This is because they are easy to implement. Other trends are huge and take a great amount of planning and strategy to launch. But these are precisely the kind of trends that give some brands a real leg up on their competition. Increasingly, the biggest trends are in the over-the-counter category, specifically in hygiene products. Hygiene products are familiar in terms of the products that consumers buy
