station is in orbit around the Earth, so there isn't any "earth" to suggest a side-on orientation. What is a good solution for this problem? A: This is a rather standard problem. A lot of the time, for probes to LEO missions, you'll have an antenna pointed at the ground (or sometimes a satellite orbital plane), which gives you an idea about where you are. This isn't a problem for you, but since the satellites you're looking for are in a different orbit than you are, you may want to calculate a different "centering point" than the sun, and thus not point your antenna at that. In this case, you'll want to consider the Earth (assuming your orbit is north-south). Your antenna is pointing
