version for a while might. In many fluid pumping applications, such as those in the beverage and cosmetics industries, it is desirable to direct a high powered pulse of pressurized water, water, or other fluids through a manifold to a variety of tools, apparatus, or devices. In the beverage industry, this pulse is directed at the base of a glass or bottle to the desired degree of chill prior to presentation to the consumer. In the cosmetics industry, this pulse can be directed at a hand piece in order to create various water jets or swirls. Typically, water is stored at a separate location prior to use with a fluid manifold which directs the water through a pressurized line to a discharge nozzle. This fluid manifold is often mounted directly onto the item or device which requires the water or fluid jet/swirl application. As the manifold housing is typically made from plastic, it is often soft and flexible. As a result, the physical connections to the manifold can be loosened or even broken by the pressures and fluid flow induced by the high pressures and pulse created from the discharge nozzle, by the attachment of the discharge nozzle to the manifold, or by the vibration and motion of the discharge nozzle. The resulting damage may be to the fluid connections or to the manifold itself. In the prior art, the attachment of a fluid manifold to a discharge nozzle has been done with set screws, adhesive bonding and with mounting clamps. These solutions are not acceptable as they can be time consuming and costly, and they also result in physical connections that are susceptible to being loosened or broken by the pressures and flow induced by the high pressures and pulse. It is also possible to connect a manifold directly to a discharge nozzle with a combination of threaded connections and a d0c515b9f4
