Signaling by seven transmembrane (7TM) receptors is generally controlled by the binding of a small molecule ligand to a well-defined extracellular binding pocket, which typically causes a conformational change in the receptor that causes the dissociation of the G protein and the activation of intracellular signaling pathways. The binding site is surrounded by the most variable and flexible regions of the receptor protein, which are difficult to resolve by x-ray crystallography. Since the first crystal structure of a rhodopsin-like receptor was reported in 1998, a number of atomic structures have been solved for other 7TM receptors, and more than 40 crystal structures for G proteins in complex with different receptors have been determined. It has become clear that the 7TM region of the receptor is very dynamic, and that the bound conformation of the ligand and the bound conformation of the receptor are often not coincident. Furthermore, it is also clear that the binding of a small-molecule ligand can induce different conformational changes in the receptor, depending on the nature of the ligand. These events contribute to the binding affinity and the selectivity of the receptor.Dietary deficiency and obesity: a hormonal connection. Preliminary evidence suggests that reduced body weight may be caused by reduced circulating levels of the endogenous insulin-like growth factor-I (IGF-I). Diet-induced changes in levels of plasma IGF-I were determined in rats fed with ca3bfb1094
