This research proposal is designed to determine the role of the liver in the control of sodium and water excretion and of carbohydrate metabolism. All of the work will be carried out in the conscious dog. The major objectives are: 1) to determine the importance of an intact liver in the ability to excrete sodium and water and to maintain carbohydrate metabolism during a variety of physiological challenges, 2) to ascertain if the response to such challenges is impaired in dogs which have undergone major hepatic resections, and 3) to determine the role of bile in the regulation of these excretory functions. The experimental design will be the same for each project. Studies will be done in sham operated dogs to determine if the major component of the renin-angiotensin-aldosterone system is required for the normal response to "stress". Studies will also be done in dogs with reduced liver mass (partial hepatectomy) to determine the importance of the liver in the regulation of renin-angiotensin-aldosterone system and glucose metabolism during stress. Another study will determine if an intact liver is required to maintain normal glucose metabolism during an intravenous glucose tolerance test. Bile will be diverted from the gallbladder and intestinal content will be diverted to the colon. The response to the diversion of bile and intestinal content will then be determined by measuring sodium, potassium, glucose and insulin excretion, and by measuring the response to a glucose tolerance test.
