Na⁺ and Cl⁻ transport across the inner mitochondrial membrane of Tetrahymena. The concentration of Na⁺ in the substrate agar medium used to induce growth of Tetrahymena decreases rapidly, causing growth to cease. At this point, the addition of appropriate concentrations of mannitol and NaCl to the non-growth medium (no agar) induces growth of the cells in the same manner as growth in the growth medium containing agar. However, the [Na⁺] inside the vacuoles is approximately 100 mM above that in the growth medium containing agar. Growth without agar, and this limited growth with mannitol or NaCl, can be prevented by omitting the K⁺ ions from the growth medium. This pattern of growth in the presence of NaCl or mannitol is induced in other ciliates examined to date, but not in yeast. Losses of Na⁺ and Cl⁻ from the cells are minor when the cells are grown on agar. However, when the cells are grown on no agar or with NaCl or mannitol, Na⁺ and Cl⁻ accumulate inside the cells. Both Na⁺ and Cl⁻ accumulate inside the vacuoles, although Cl⁻ accumulates in the vacuoles to a much greater extent than does Na⁺. This suggests that the enzyme(s) required for Na⁺ and Cl⁻ transport across the inner membrane of Tetrahymena is located on the external surface of the membrane. In contrast, the concentrations of Na⁺ and Cl⁻ inside the vacuoles of yeast do not increase when the growth medium contains either NaCl or mannitol. The ability to raise the [Na⁺] of the growth medium allows the exclusive induction of growth in Tetrahymena and its relatives.
