laptopAgency: 6th National Survey Years: 1992-2013 Findings: The Farmhouse has become a much more popular design style in the last twenty years, but today, farms are more likely to feature a wide range of styles than ever before. In the 1990's, 57% of farms had more than one style of house. However, in 2013, 83% of the nation's farms have more than one style of house. Sustainability by style of house In 2013, a significant number of farms, (48%) utilize sustainable building technologies.
These farms are significantly more likely to have sustainable houses than farms of the 1990's (38% in 1992). Farms with a greenhouse or a garden are significantly more likely to incorporate solar energy in their household energy mix than farms without either of these technologies. On farms with only one house, styles are most commonly traditional (40%), followed by a variety of styles (23%), farmhouse (15%), post-and-beam (10%), and then country houses (8%). Farms with a variety of styles are significantly more likely to have solar energy than farms with only one house style. Structure of the farmhouse The vast majority of farms (75%) have only one farmhouse structure. However, more than one third of the total number of farms (39%) have more than one farmhouse structure. Most farms have an average of only one farmhouse. However, farms that have an average of three farmhouse structures, (7% of farms), are most likely to also have a greenhouse, a garden, and a dairy operation, compared to farms that have an average of one farmhouse structure. Farmhouse styles and farm size There is a strong relationship between farmhouse structure and farm size.
Large farms that have three farmhouse structures are the most likely to also have solar energy and a greenhouse or garden. On large farms, farmhouses are most commonly a traditional farmhouse (36%), followed by a variety of styles (29%), a post-and-beam (10%), and a country house (7%). On medium farms, farmhouses are most often a variety of farmhouse structures (37%), followed by traditional farmhouses (33%). Farmhouse style and income Farms with a traditional farmhouse are significantly more likely to
