Patients who are asked to undergo a modified radical mastectomy have often expressed fears about the adverse psychological effects of the operation. These fears are usually linked with the experience of the radical operation. Dutch oncologists, however, state that a modified radical mastectomy is a more extensive operation, and that the patients often fear to undergo such an operation. We compared the subjective response of 43 women who had undergone a modified radical mastectomy with a response of a matched group of 48 women who had chosen a lumpectomy.
