I have an asp.net mvc website that I would like to use responsive design/mobile viewport support on. From what I can see there is no meta viewport standard so I thought I would have to add a bit of java script to the head of my index.html page to set a different viewport for mobile devices. The data I want to read is available in the html comment tag. I have looked at the Google API for viewport support and it looks like there may be a full featured support for responsive design on mobile from there. Is there a way I can add this meta viewport tag to my index.html page? If not is there another way I can achieve the same result? A: You are going to need to add the meta viewport tag to your head, if you are using separate index.html files. You can also do it dynamically using a server-side script. The HTML5 Boilerplate documentation explains in detail how to approach this. See here for adding meta viewport in a separate index.html file: For doing this dynamically, there are many resources, one of which is detailed here: . w\*6.50\* \[ \]; The number of inequality constraints \*N~c~\*is chosen large enough to capture the dynamics of the state vector  $\mathbf{\overset{`}{x}}$  plus, the residual vector

$\mathbf{r}$  (given by (15) and (17)) is almost zero in the initial conditions. The control vector  $\mathbf{r}$

What's new:

to Ganja: Indoor Growing If you know anything about marijuana growing, you know indoor grows are commonly referred to as "ganja". You've seen it in articles, magazines, online forums, and you've undoubtedly heard it people in word of mouth references. What is this term? Is it actually something you'd use? Is this just a harmless use of abbreviations or does it need to be retired? Let's find out. What Does Ganja Mean? Don't mistake the term for a product, like marijuana candy or liquor. We're talking about a very specific term for a unique plant whose very own Wikipedia page shows that it has many assorted names. That page may be located here: So now we know, GANJA it's a word like GUNJA or GRANDPA! You've seen it, read it, sung it to yourself in a song, but did you ever ask yourself this? How exactly is "ganja" spelled? We know it's "G-A-N-J-A", but where do we read that? The complete grammatical analysis is easier to explain when you see it. Consider the order of these terms. Ganja — noun — the dried leaves or flowers of the plant cannabis sativa Ha! After a red squiggly line comes something about the verb "to be" and then the suffix "-POSS", which sounds a little bit like an "sssss" sound depending on the pronunciation. What's that squiggle? It says "ganja"! Did you notice a pattern? Before we get into the specifics of the suffix "-POSS", let's analyze the english language using the same order. It says the "-er" comes before the "-POSS"! So after a red squiggly line comes the "-POSS" then the verb "to be" and then finally the "-er", which in english is usually spelled E-R or -ER! Finally, the suffix "-er"! But what does it really mean?
