Linda Wheeler, who heads the Institute for Nonprofit News, noted in the report that much of the income earned by nonprofits comes from a small number of donors who have long been able to pick and choose the organizations they support and to use their personal wealth to fund them. But that hasn't always been the case. "The foundation sector was almost entirely reliant upon massive foundations and endowments," Wheeler said, noting that the 1970s became known as "the foundation decade." To support this, she said, the sector adopted the notion that if they were to depend on wealthy individuals, they also had to depend on big foundations. Those foundations leveraged the assets of affluent individuals and their personal fortunes to fund not just general support of nonprofit work but specific programs and projects as well. Wheeler said that early on, in the 1960s, "they thought that big foundations or some form of 'pluralism' would fund out there from small contributors." "But eventually, the volume of those revenues began to decline as the wealthy individual donor base moved their giving to foundations in order to meet the size and scope of their charitable giving," she said. Meanwhile, the sector has continued to grow and many of the people who have found themselves giving to the sector through their personal fortunes have opened their wallets. This has been driven by a few factors, including the desire to support both a cause that is personally meaningful and a cause that is also good for the community and the economy. But by and large, Wheeler said, this has been driven by a desire to help a cause that
