Columbus Blue Jackets forward Cam Atkinson met with the Class of 2016 Golden Class earlier in the day at the United States Military Academy in West Point, New York. COLUMBUS, Ohio -- For most of the 5,670 prospects who will pack the streets of West Point, New York this weekend for the Army-Navy game, it will be just another day at the office. But for the select few who will be introduced to the nation by NBC Sports Group on Saturday night in a pregame ceremony, it will be the culmination of months, even years, of training and preparation. The Class of 2016 Golden Class have been honing their skills -- and their swagger -- in West Point for the past three months, training with an intensity and discipline not seen in previous classes. "The highlight of my football career was coming here," Navy junior defensive tackle Tommy Palasek said. "It's such a huge honor to play in this game. It's bigger than college football." Palasek is entering his fourth year at Navy, but his experience of watching and playing against Army for the past three years should give him a distinct advantage over this year's Golden Class. "They're just so motivated, and they bring the intensity, and that's what you want to do," Navy head
