As is known in the art, computer systems require a reliable and highly available storage system in order to ensure that critical data is properly backed up in order to satisfy common data backup requirements. Such a system typically includes a variety of computerized components and is commonly placed in a data center or other central location. For example, such a system may include a primary storage volume that is typically backed up to a secondary storage volume, where a primary storage volume comprises a local drive and a secondary storage volume comprises a remote computer system or network attached storage (NAS) device. In order for the data to be continuously available, if the primary storage volume goes down then backup data from the secondary volume is used to ensure that the data is not lost. However, the typical backup operation requires that the data be stored on the secondary volume prior to the backup process commencing. As a result, data updates to the primary volume that have not yet been stored on the secondary volume are not backed up. Consequently, data updates to the primary volume are
