Making Space On the third floor of the Torrance, California high school building, students man a drone in a program that teaches them about STEM subjects while practicing the principles of aerospace engineering. Computers, science, and math. That's how it goes. Admissions for most high schools tend to be pretty narrow, and that can be stressful because you have a finite amount of time to dedicate to a particular subject. Dr. Munirah Saifuddin is working to transform how high school students view STEM. "I love electronics. I think computers, robotics, and electronics is what I was born to do," said Saifuddin, an AAPI nonprofit student at Torrance High School. "I want to inspire as many students as I can to consider a career in this field." As an Engineering and Aerospace Cadet (EAC) student at Torrance High School (THS), Saifuddin is part of a program that provides experiential training in aerospace engineering through the live-fly-lab program. Over the course of the semester, EAC students, members of the working community, and THS faculty work to build and fly a UAV (Unmanned Aerial Vehicle), a type of small unmanned aerial vehicle or drone. Using the engineering principles of design, planning, and execution, the drones are programmed to explore the world beyond the classroom walls. The drones that EAC students build are different from typical drones because they are smaller and more powerful, with the ability to fly autonomously, return to a pre-determined point, and communicate with the student and THS staff. These drones are an important part of this program because the UAV gives the students work with the instructors in the building blocks of engineering: design, planning, and execution. EAC students use the "design design, planning, and execution. EAC students use the "design design, planning, a

About Us We have been offering free porn videos on this website for several years. In that time we have built a reliable reputation for being a safe and private place for people who want to watch free porn videos. Now we have launched a new Free Porn Video Download section. Our goal is to provide as many free porn videos as possible for our visitors. We continue to grow and we will be adding new free porn video every day. Enjoy our free porn videos. Effect of haematoporphyrin derivative (HPD) to interfere with the localization of drug resistance in human promyelocytic leukaemia cells was investigated. Drug resistance was induced in human promyelocytic leukaemia cells were subsequently incubated in the dark with 5-fluorouracil, the fluoro-drug accumulated within the nucleus and caused a marked reduction in the light emission from surrounding cytosol. Similarly, in cells exposed to doxorubicin, the fluoro-drug accumulated in the cell nucleus and it was possible to detect a striking reduction in the light emitted from surrounding cytosol. Drug accumulation was not, however, homogeneous, with clusters of drug-accumulating cells being identified. Cellular uptake of chemotherapeutic drugs was also examined in leukaemia cells previously incubated with HPD. We observed a marked reduction in the accumulation of 5-fluorouracil and doxorubicin into HPD-preincubated cells. Based on our findings, we suggest that HPD pretreament may be a new approach to the possible eradication of chemoresistant tumour cells. The University of Virginia has hired the leading academic expert on homosexuality to direct the school's new, taxpayer-funded, Office of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Concerns. As director of the campus's office, Joe Trimble will be responsible for hiring staff and developing curricula for a new academic program on LGBT issues. He will also be a resource for students and staff who need LGBT services, administrators said. The selection of the university's first full-time director of an LGBT studies program was a
