Magazine CL & A - Essay : A new imperative for strategic golf February 7, 2000 Golf is America's great national sport, a game for which the public, which can't even watch the Champions Tour live, can tolerate a sport that few outside the United States care about. America is an immigrant nation. It was in the first decades of the 20th century that the game began to take hold in the New World. And there was at least one thing for which the immigrants were grateful back then. In 1902, back in Scotland, a group of cricketers and curlers began to wonder how a new spectator sport could be introduced to their homeland. They were still thinking about it three years later when the President of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club of St. Andrews was visiting the United States. If the powers that be at St. Andrews got their way, they could soon play cricket in that nation as well. But when William MacKenzie and Walter Elliot arrived in America in 1905 to prove that the game could be popularized here, they were just as much in awe as Americans of their own people's reaction when they mentioned cricket. "The only trouble with America is that it is too damned free," MacKenzie would write. "These people will try anything that looks different." It was a huge mistake for the St. Andrews club to take the American public for granted, and from the beginning it was the game's popularity here that made it the global phenomenon it is today. Several million Americans now play golf, and the sport has transformed from a hunting and fishing game into a multibillion-dollar leisure industry. There's nothing surprising about a nation that has a love for football and baseball embracing the more accessible pastime of golf. But the golf boom has helped to change American culture more than any other game or sport has since Major League Baseball came along. And though there are several imported golfing stars, including Seve Ballesteros, Ian Woosnam, and the Koreans from the 1984 Olympic team, in recent years Americans have begun to outnumber the rest of the world combined in golf tournaments. While other professional sports have struggled to adjust to a new commercial sensibility, the golf industry has prospered along with the rest of the economy. In 1999, revenues from all golf-related products and services hit $22.8 billion. Up from $22.3 billion in 1998. And that's just from the Yeah, that's right. American's have beaten the Japanese, the greatest superpower in the World with their superior technology. The Japanese are one of the greatest shogi players in the World, and their shogi pieces are built by the highest quality steel. They can play the game for hours and hours on end without getting tired. But they can't beat the U.S., because America is the best at shogi. In shogi, the Japanese are totally good at everything. Imagine if Japan had defeated America in one of the world wars? That would have been one crazy event./19 Four letters picked without replacement from vvvvvvvvvvvvvvvvmv.
