Democrats in the House of Representatives today will debate the merits of officially doing away with federal student aid programs in favor of vouchers, while demanding that states use the money they lose to pay for private school tuition. The resolution, submitted by far-left Massachusetts Rep. Jim McGovern (D), would make massive cuts to Pell Grants and other student aid programs. The bill would give schools tuition tax breaks worth billions of dollars. The legislation came days after Education Secretary Betsy DeVos said in a House Appropriations subcommittee hearing that increasing school choice for children will lead to even more competition. Sending money to school choice is a way to work around the policy that currently allows children to attend their school of choice but parents to not send their child to a school of choice, DeVos said. "I suspect that where choice is allowed, we will see more choice used to make families leave the community and go to a school that is more convenient for them," DeVos told the panel. Democrats have long demonized DeVos, and this week's events only serves to undermine the trust they have in her as a woman. DeVos has criticized federal student aid programs for their failures in supporting the poor, and has also noted that the federal education law Obamacare passed in 2010 has burdened states. However, the bill actually takes federal student aid programs and puts them behind a wall to control the money. The Department of Education would be defunded and the budget would not be reauthorized, meaning no federal funds would be released to universities. The bill would be "dead on arrival" with President Donald Trump in office, according to GOP leaders, due to the fact that Republicans want to see billions of dollars in federal money flow to schools. Vouchers have been a Democratic idea for decades, and during the 2016 presidential campaign President Barack Obama said he thought children should be allowed to attend whichever school is the best for them. "I have said repeatedly that I think we should provide a voucher system where families can use vouchers to go to a private school or other public schools of their choice, and this bill would provide an opportunity for us to do that," Obama said in January 2015. In 2011, he vowed to veto a similar bill if it passed. "Let's be clear, as I've said time and time again, vouchers do nothing to improve the quality of education in the public schools," he told
