An organic electro-luminescence display (organic EL display) that uses an organic electro-luminescence (organic EL) element is a display that has been developed by combining a light emitting element that uses an organic compound and a thin film transistor (TFT) and can be reduced in thickness and weight. It is possible to carry out various design changes in the organic electro-luminescence display by using a transparent substrate which does not transmit a light from the light emitting element and realizes a display with a large area. Since the organic electro-luminescence display has characteristics in which the emission of light from the light emitting element is a spontaneous emission and has a fast response speed, it is expected to be a display for the next generation. An organic layer including a light emitting layer, a hole transport layer, an electron transport layer, etc. has generally been formed by vapor depositing a thin film made of an organic material using a sputtering method, a vapor deposition method, a solution coating method, etc. However, it is still difficult to form a thin film at a uniform thickness in the vapor depositing method. In addition, particles of deposition products which have not been adhered to a substrate may remain in the thin film formed by the vapor depositing method and not be removed. This leads to a problem
