Protein kinase C (PKC) consists of a family of enzymes that, on activation, translocate to membranes where they can phosphorylate specific cellular substrates. PKCs form a family of at least 12 isozymes, each encoded by a distinct gene, and they interact cooperatively to modulate signaling pathways. An isozyme cannot catalyze every signaling pathway, even though it might be expressed ubiquitously. Consequently, to be a functional regulator, a PKC must interact with the signaling machinery. The molecular complexes of PKCs have been shown to occur in the cell, but the diversity of these complexes is only partially understood. In this chapter we present examples of specific complexes of PKC subunits that illustrate how PKC isoforms can form distinct complexes and in so doing show how they might be selective in their signaling.Q: Selecting a single row after using.select I want to select a single row after using.select in a recipe, but it only returns an empty string: scheduled_every_n: '# 648931e174
