President-elect Donald Trump will name his choice as the next U.S. secretary of state on Thursday, but Republicans and Democrats alike have their own favorites. The most predictable pick: Oklahoma Attorney General Scott Pruitt. The former climate change skeptic is a favorite of the fossil fuel industry, which donated over $100,000 to his political campaigns. He was tapped to oversee the Environmental Protection Agency earlier this year. But a raft of other names are being floated as potential picks for the job. A few take a firm stand against the so-called climate science position that is being pushed by Mr. Trump. Others seem focused on strengthening American diplomatic efforts, or on shaping global climate policy. Some are pushing names that would appease foreign interests, most notably Russia and China, with others looking to fulfill a promise to build a “better relationship” with the Kremlin. Below are five choices that are being kept off the table — for now. Rex Tillerson

Rex Tillerson served as President George W. Bush’s secretary of state from January 2005 until February 2009. His name has been most recently associated with the oil business, but he has extensive experience in politics, having been involved in the Bush administration, as well as representing the state of Texas. Tillerson, 68, is a long-time Republican fundraiser and supporter of right-wing causes. He also ran unsuccessfully for governor of Texas twice, losing in 2010 and 2014 to more centrist Democrats. Tillerson is well-known for his closeness with Vladimir Putin. He was a member of the board of directors of a Russian energy company at the time of the invasion of Crimea, and he has spoken out against sanctions and other measures being taken to sanction Putin’s government. He’s also a disciple of infamous climate skeptic Willie Soon, and has spoken out against the growing acceptance of climate change and increased regulation. “We have to keep energy in free markets,” he told The Daily Caller in 2015. “I’ve never changed my mind on that.” 6d1f23a050
