"Emanuel Saez and Peter R.Month: August 2013 Estonia's great technological strengths in renewable energy and energy efficiency combined with highly skilled and educated labour force will be our core of competitive advantages in the global business. However, these strengths are also fundamental for Estonia's future. At the same time, Estonia must remain a competitive and productive economy. An annual trade deficit cannot be a basis for a stable economy. Among the most important tasks is to get the banking sector in shape. There are many reasons for that. Bankers are the engine of the economy. Their job is not only to contribute to the smooth running of markets, but also to help develop people's expectations and to protect consumers. Our banking sector has great experience in these areas. However, it has not met the financial demands of the globalisation and market integration after the financial crisis in Europe. The Estonian banking system is among the strongest and most solid in the region. Yet, it needs new approaches and, more importantly, more capital to sustain its leading position. Estonia is a young country. At the beginning of the modern age, the Republic of Estonia was inhabited by a population of a few hundred thousand people. Now, the country has a population of just over 1.3 million. Over the course of this millennium, the country has continuously evolved from a nation of our own to an important member of the European Union. All in all, we need reliable technology in order to build a new, more competitive economy
