Q: How to add a reference to a filetype on Xcode? I have changed the default behavior to show the IB Items rather than Build in the "Build Settings" of an Xcode project. As a result, the old working way of using a (.) in the build phase to a folder is no longer working. Now I have to set up the reference for each filetype I need. This is not optimal. Is there a possibility to set up the reference or "Build Setting" for a reference? A: You can use a raw value, which basically just provides a link to another file (from a file that's not in the project). Raw values can be generated by the build system. I believe that there is no way to create raw values for file types, but there are ways to refer to files. For example, if you have a file called RawData.txt, and it's in the same directory as the project, then you can use it as a value for any File Reference. This is just an example, so you need to know how to do this. When you set the value, you don't need to use the new way of referencing. You just give the path directly as the value.
