A new solution to control the flow rate and sludge separation in a compact multichannel vertical reactor. Multichannel vertical reactors have been applied in practical wastewater treatment. The flow rate of wastewater in a compact reactor can be varied by adding a reagent from outside. However, using a reagent from outside may cause problems, such as the formation of precipitate or clogging. The distance between channels is adjusted by injecting a reagent from outside. The reagent's effectiveness is limited by channel distance and the injection process can be dangerous if the distance is too small. In this work, a single reagent-jetting unit was used to adjust the distance between channels. The channels in the compact reactor were lined with a nonwoven cloth. The effect of flow rate control was also investigated. The inlet flow rate was controlled by varying the injection rate. When the flow rate of an incoming wastewater stream was controlled at a constant value, the flow rate in each channel was also controlled. This new solution has advantages, such as less flow rate error, less reagent consumption and no need to adjust the distance between channels. Reagents can be used alternately, and may not be absorbed by the nonwoven cloth. The reagent's effectiveness can also be improved by using a thinner cloth. The unique design of the multichannel vertical reactor makes it possible to control the flow rate in each channel and thus provide a new solution to improve reactor performance and overcome its disadvantages.WHO WE ARE You're Beautiful UK is an award winning, female-owned and run beauty and lifestyle store.
