Inspectors from the World Health Organization (WHO) will visit manufacturing plants in the UK and Cuba to ensure the insecticide is being used in an appropriate way, as a second British firm has temporarily suspended sales of the substance to Mexico. The UK firm said: "Coumaphos has, today, been withdrawn from export to Mexico until necessary advice on certification of the product can be given by the EC of the US and its international certifiers for use of this product in the face of the current Zika virus outbreak." The company added: "An independent review will be undertaken at a later date to enable the EC of the US to determine if Coumaphos may be used in the face of the current Zika virus outbreak." Coumaphos is a synthetic chemical insecticide that can be used for mosquito control. It has been used widely in the UK and elsewhere to combat malaria-carrying mosquitoes. But the WHO's top health official, Dr Margaret Chan, has warned that it may not be effective against Zika, a virus that causes mild symptoms but can cause devastating birth defects. Mexico's government said on Saturday that the outbreak had reached 139 cases, with 26 confirmed deaths, while the Pan American Health Organization announced three more cases. Mexico has declared the outbreak a national emergency and has urged pregnant women to avoid travelling to or from countries where the virus has been detected. Mexico's health minister, José Narro, said it was "too early to rule out" the presence of the virus in Guadalajara, where a recent traveller from Brazil was recently diagnosed with the virus. The suspension in the UK came after the Biopesticide Authority, a UK regulator, told manufacturers to stop spraying the pesticide around full moons, when the insect population is at its highest, from 1 February. "Coumaphos needs to be sprayed in the morning and late afternoon, or in very hot weather," the company said. "Spraying earlier or later in 6d1f23a050
