As one of such lighting apparatuses, a lighting apparatus is known that has a plurality of light sources, and that can reduce electric power consumption, as compared with a lighting apparatus that uses a plurality of fluorescent lamps. However, in the lighting apparatus that has a plurality of LEDs, since these LEDs are made small and a large amount of light is emitted, glare may occur, which may affect human eyes. In addition, since heat radiating properties of the small and thin LEDs is not high, heat may accumulate, which may cause a failure of the LEDs and/or an increase in temperature. For this reason, in order to prevent the occurrence of such an inconvenience, many techniques have been developed for a lighting apparatus that has a plurality of light sources. For example, PTL 1 discloses a lighting device that has a first light-emitting element, a second light-emitting element, a wavelength-converting element, and a heat-radiating member.Q: Passing variables to a HTML response page in PHP I have a php script that outputs a list of files and associated directory information when called via a.cgi script in the CLI. The script takes two arguments: a first one called $infile is a directory name, and the second is $outfile is the name of a file in that directory to output. If $infile is absolute, the script looks like this:
