Political System Of Pakistan. Functional, histological, and biochemical changes following incisional hernia repair with biomaterial and tisseel: comparison of two meshes in a randomized trial. A randomized controlled study was performed to compare the function, morphology, and biochemical constituents of fibroblasts cultured on a new lightweight, narrow-meshed prosthesis (Duflex) with a heavyweight prosthesis (Prolene) following incisional hernia repair. Thirty-two patients undergoing incisional hernia repair with either Duflex or Prolene were studied. Postoperative outcome was assessed by a standardized questionnaire on physical and emotional symptoms as well as by an analysis of functioning tests. The quality of the soft tissue covering the mesh was assessed at 6 and 12 months after surgery. The number of recurrences was 12 of 16 in the group with Duflex and five of 16 with Prolene. The functional results were similar. Histological examination at 12 months showed that Duflex implants were covered with a uniform, even noninflammatory, cellular tissue, whereas the Prolene group was covered by scar tissue with a highly fibroblast-dense mesh and peripheral calcification. In Duflex a 35% increase in collagen production compared with the control group occurred with a simultaneous reduction in a 27% decrease in glycosaminoglycan synthesis in comparison with the Prolene group. In both groups the collagen/glycosaminoglycan ratio was reduced with longer implant duration. Thus, Duflex has favorable histological properties and induces a higher collagen/glycosaminoglycan ratio than does Prolene. Although this difference was not associated with clinical superiority, Duflex seemed to create more favorable tissue reactions than did Prolene at 12 months. Solder alloys, such as lead-tin (Pb/Sn) alloys, have been used to bond structural surfaces of electronic equipment. In typical soldering operations, a flux material is applied to a first surface and the flux is softened by flowing the flux over the surface. The flux reacts with residual oxides or other film materials to degrade the oxides and remove them prior to the deposition of solder and the formation of a good 6d1f23a050
