The electronic banking industry is growing quickly, generating increasing volumes of transactions. These transactions are generally performed by telephone using credit cards and debit cards as well as by computer using credit cards, debit cards, checks, and other electronic transfer mechanisms. A common business model for companies that perform these transactions is to collect a flat fee of approximately $50 (or more) per transaction, for each type of transaction. If the company fails to receive the fee, the company loses the transaction, so it is desirable for the company to receive all of its flat fee for all of the transactions it performs. This model for payment facilitates both customer satisfaction by ensuring that the customer is always paid for his transaction and the company's profitability by maximizing the volume of transactions it can perform for a given fee. However, this common business model is subject to fraud. A caller may attempt to defraud the company by having the caller's credit card stolen and then presented to the company. When the credit card is presented, the company may charge the credit card user an amount that is much more than the $50 fee that the company actually receives. In some cases, the fraudulently used credit card is also stolen and used in another fraudulent transaction. One solution to fraud is to minimize the risk of fraud by requiring that the caller present a real credit card that has not been reported stolen. However, the required effort to obtain a valid credit card that has not been reported stolen is quite difficult, particularly for customers that use credit cards to pay by telephone. Alternately, the company may rely on the caller to provide other form of payment that decreases the risk of fraud, but this method for collecting payment is not as effective because the company has no assurance that the payment is actually made with the required level of security.
