Immunoelectron microscopy has been used for the first time to localize receptors for hormones to specific receptor sites on the plasma membrane of different cell types in cryosections and on plasma membranes isolated from the cell types. The methodology makes use of rabbit antibodies to either a hormone or its receptor and the immunohistochemical localization of these antibodies by the peroxidase-labeled avidin-biotin-complex method. This technique offers several advantages over the conventional dextran-indicator enzyme method. The distribution of hormone receptors in the plasma membrane of epithelial cells is more precise and some specificity of the antibody and the immunoperoxidase-label can be observed in the picture of the ligand-receptor complex.
