Architectural information is critical to any project. A properly defined and managed solution can save money and time. ARCHICAD gives you a one-stop shop for all the information you need and lets you store and manage it across your entire design process, from concept to construction documents, including feedback and revisions. One of the most common questions I get is "I'm a Design Architect. What ARCHICAD application should I use?", and what I typically recommend is: when the design is well planned, then the best ARCHICAD application for the project is SOPCAD. If the design is not well planned, though, you might want to keep ARCHICAD, and use it's GDL objects "as is", or to train or develop a better design process. This training will give you the opportunity to explore Design Architect 2012, in an advanced way, along with a few other useful tools. It will also give you the chance to discuss with other ARCHICAD USERS the new features, new functions, and new ways of thinking about Design Architect 2012. Design Architect 2012 is much more than a CAD program. Design Architect is a way of thinking, a way of designing, a way of designing with others, a way of sharing, a way to show what's been designed. Design Architect 2012 is a significant update to the way we do things, and it's obvious that we want to find out how Design Architect 2012 changes our design process. Even if you are not a professional Architect, you may be interested in this topic. There are many issues that require you to be familiar with how to use ARCHICAD well, and there are many issues that you may be surprised to learn about once you begin to use ARCHICAD. For example, there is many workflow, operation, and method questions that will need to be answered as you begin using Design Architect 2012. I will talk about some of these issues in this training session.
