Indeed, we've heard of cases in which spammers sent targeted phishing emails to first-time users, or to people who were actively trying to sell on Craigslist, to trick them into sending their personal identification details to the spammers. The following is a small sampling of emails from victims, which we ran through the INKY spam detection tool. According to the INKY report, the emails were set to surface on a daily basis, and were marked as originated from Craigslist addresses. They also contained links to credential-stealing files, some of them laden with malicious code. And all of this might be taking place without Craigslist noticing. Phishing campaigns have been very fruitful, as the INKY report and this one have shown. They can harvest a ton of email addresses, and then use them to deliver malicious payloads. The only challenge is that as INKY and we have shown, the emails are being sent through proxy servers. So they may be caught in the act. Among the victims of such a successful attack was the cybercrime gang known as Crime in Progress, which appears to have suffered serious financial losses. Crooks using the email addresses of their dead associates have been trying to sell their own stolen goods on Craigslist, according to INKY's report. The INKY researcher Mateusz Niewiek realized that the extortion operation was a real-time scam, and has been sharing his findings with the gang and government police. Meanwhile, Craigslist keeps enhancing its anti-spam system, although it has no control over the kind of data entering that spam-ridden system. Blocking spam became considerably more difficult in 2015, thanks to the introduction of online dating services. Google was able to provide at least some measure of protection by warning users if they were about to receive messages from sketchy websites. That effort, and the introduction of the Spam Tags API in 2015 are helping to contain spam, the INKY report said.

over the years, emails posing as craigslist listings have become almost ubiquitous in the spammy world, to the point where they are no longer a rarity.

but this is not enough to list out these emails as merely trickery. in order to do so, you have to consider the following points: craigslist does not give out your email address to potential buyers so the people pretending to be from craigslist are misleading the person receiving the email and, subsequently, identity theft.

people should be cautious when entering sensitive information into the site as this could be used for scamming purposes. craigslist makes the listing process very easy for its users by providing a domain name as well as an ip address. this means that if someone wanted to impersonate a craigslist listing, they can easily do so by using these. these phishing emails pose an extremely high risk of security breaches to the users themselves as well as their companies. phishing emails are sent from a spoofed ip, hence making it quite easy for the hackers to remain anonymous. craigslist is one of the most popular sources of free classifieds. while the craigslist page has a very handy feature to help you filter emails from scam artists, it is still possible to get fooled by email scams. this mailer further proves that craigslist isnt always safe, even when you verify account details and the contacts on your account. the site itself is a huge part of why people use it. while craigslist claims that all account owners are required to verify their email address, and that they will be held to account should they fail to do so, emails continue to be issued with no verification. if you are using a craigslist email, and you have verified your account, you may want to validate it just in case. 5ec8ef588b
