the authors also discuss in section 6 the definition of "personal data subject." under copra, a personal data subject is an individual whose data is subject to the rights and protections under section 2 of the act. section 2 would grant individuals the right to be informed about the collection, use, and transfer of their personal data. a person's personal data is information that can be used to identify that person. thus, the act would expand the definition of personal data to include the identity of a person, as well as information that reveals that person's identity. the authors then discuss in section 7 the definition of "collection of personal data." under copra, the term "collection of personal data" refers to the acquisition, collection, and assembly of personal data. as such, copra would broaden the definition of personal data to include the identity of a person, as well as information that reveals that person's identity. the authors then discuss in section 8 of the act the definition of "public authority" under the act. the ftc would play a supervisory role in copras implementation. the authors discuss that copra would define public authorities as "any government entity or subdivision that is authorized to collect or receive personal data for the purpose of carrying out its functions or duties." the authors then discuss in section 9 of the act the definition of "transferee" under the act. the ftc would play a supervisory role in copras implementation. copra would define a transferee as an entity that acquires, collects, or uses personal data for a commercial purpose.

copra would require entities to notify the ftc about security breaches, and report such breaches to the ftc within 60 days. copra would prohibit entities from destroying certain records of breaches. finally, copra would require the ftc to conduct audits of covered entities, and to issue letters of compliance to entities that fail to comply with copra. additionally, the proposed law requires covered entities to obtain express opt-in consent before using a person's private information to market products or services to that person. while some privacy advocates may cry foul, this provision is largely meaningless. many of the entities covered by copra already do this. for example, auto dealers routinely market products and services to customers, and many financial institutions, telecom companies, and retailers sell services and products to consumers. the additional burden on entities is not only tangential. even if copra imposes no substantive requirements on covered entities, the mere act of obtaining consent puts businesses in a difficult position. that consent must be gathered in a timely manner, and if a customer indicates that she does not want to be contacted for marketing purposes, then the business cannot start contacting her. the business must respect this wish. coprafea rf is the first commercially available product and technology that empowers designers to simulate and control the behavior of real rolls through virtual simulation and roll forming. for the first time, engineers can simulate actual rolls on their computer, and simulate their roll forming behavior. the software is compatible with virtually all standard software packages. 5ec8ef588b
