nodes and renderables maris gives artists the ability to create and combine nodes and renderables for an even greater range of effects and behaviours. renderables allow you to dynamically place materials, lights, cameras, and effects in the scene. foundry says that it will defend its legal position to the end, but it has offered to settle with the defendant companies for between $5,000 and $15,000 per instance of infringement. we have been informed that this sum is the maximum amount the companies will be asked to pay. it is not yet clear what will happen to assets made using these crack versions. the company expects that the assets can be used by the users who created them, although the company says that it is also aware that some of these assets have been used by other customers to create their own assets, in breach of the licence agreements. tf is still waiting for a response from the companies in question. "we do not engage in distributing crack software. we do not encourage it and would not recommend it. we did not provide any support, advice or assistance to the individual who has been accused of such activity. we would not do so." some artists have already used the crack version of mari to create assets for other artists, though there is no evidence that this has happened on a scale that would see the company lose out financially. tf has been provided with a list of names and companies that are involved in the recent settlement, as well as a list of all those who have received letters from foundry. we will not be naming these individuals and companies.
