now, we can talk about whether or not a standalone workstation license is justified. in the pricing of the standalone workstation license, microsoft priced it low, in an attempt to protect the single-user workstation user from buying a bunch of licenses, by discounting them to the point where the retail price would be almost the same as what you would pay for a datacenter license. the standalone license is not a viable option for most companies. businesses have workstations in the office to run desktop applications for their users. workstation licensing is not meant to be used as a desktop operating system by a single user in the office. workstation licensing is a b2b offering that price it too low to compete with datacenter or embedded licensing. not an employee of microsoft, and not an msp, see disclaimer below. i have been an it professional for over 25 years. i run a consulting and software reselling business here in northern virginia. i specialize in working with microsoft products and applications. i regularly write about microsoft products and services for several technology blogs. i was a microsoft mvp for 15 years and a recipient of the mvp award for 2005-2013. i wouldnt agree with this at all. the licensing requirements for datacenter and enterprise editions are the same. just because youre not getting any extra capability does not mean that they are the same. that kind of nonsensical thinking is why the world is a slow-moving toilet bowl i really dont understand what youre saying here. your first paragraph is a real mess of sloppily written, ill-thought-out rubbish. your second paragraph is also full of nonsensical garbage. the point i was trying to make is: its not like microsoft chose to release windows server 2013 with datacenter edition only. it just so happens that, for whatever reason, they didnt make any external changes to the product other than those needed to support the new virtualization features. so youre left with their original product with all the features from their original release. its all still there.

to correct the licensing mode for the remote host, for this to work the original host which is running the remote desktop services must have their remote desktop licensing service activated, and if there is no active licence server for that original host, then the remote host will not have licensing activated. to correct this, you'll need to either activate the license server first, and then move the service activation to the remote host, or, if the original host does not have an active license server, to add an inactive licence server to the original host. thats not the same thing at all. licensing applies to software. the licenses in this case are meaningless in themselves. theres no software that requires licenses to be activated or not, nor any licenses that are affected by the license of the software. any licenses in a kms system are kept on the build and the activation system determines if they were activated. the activation log doesnt affect the licenses. it only tracks activations and grants/denies the right to activate licenses. you activate the licenses at your discretion by installing them. a regular software installer does not do this. instead, the server has to have a license to even install a software package. when you install a software package, you have to add that package to the users own activation. no activation is required and no activation can be denied. what happens with an activation count in kms? there is no software and the server doesnt need to have licenses. the count is about compliance. if youre making more than 1 machine available with the same licenses, you must have audit records of exactly which machines you used the licenses on. otherwise, the customers are getting free licenses that are used on other systems. 5ec8ef588b
