With the proliferation of cellular wireless communications technology, many wireless service providers are continually adding additional cellular wireless communication standards to their service portfolios. For example, many of these wireless service providers offer customers the ability to connect to networks using wireless technology such as CDMA2000, E-UTRAN (also referred to as LTE (Long Term Evolution)), and/or the like. As a result, service providers have a substantial investment in their networks, including numerous base stations, switching centers, and other infrastructure. With an aging infrastructure, there is an ongoing need for improved and enhanced functionality in wireless communications between the wireless subscribers and the base stations.Characterization of the reaction products of hydrogen peroxide with the medium-chain fatty acids, palmitic and lauric acid, in a protein matrix. The medium-chain fatty acids, palmitic and lauric acid, are present in cellular lipids where they may be associated with proteins. In this paper we describe studies of the reaction of hydrogen peroxide with palmitic and lauric acid in the presence of an albumin-globulin matrix to determine the effect of the protein environment on the fatty acid peroxidation. The reaction of the fatty acids with hydrogen peroxide was studied by the use of thin-layer chromatography. The formation of the primary lipid peroxidation products, aldehydes and ketones, was evaluated by the use of derivatization procedures. The results of the work indicate that lauric and palmitic acids are essentially non-enzymatically converted to their primary lipid peroxidation products at low concentrations of hydrogen peroxide in the presence of proteins. At higher concentrations of hydrogen peroxide the degree of peroxidation increased.
