This wireless access point also is great when you have both wireless and wired access points in different locations, like the home or office. The access points auto stays with WDS. All I had to do was plug an ethernet cable into the router and the AP and I was able to get connected to the network. This AP also has the ability to create link aggregation groups. This can be used to aggregate all the devices connected to a wireless access point or act as a pseudo-switch so that multiple clients can share a wireless connection. At first, I didn't want to use this AP because when I bought it, I didn't need to use WDS and I didn't want to be stuck trying to get WDS to work (it was a pain in the ). I later learned that I didn't need to use WDS and that I can use the access point in client mode. I can then use the ethernet connection from a client to the AP to get network access. Both of my computers can access the network. It also works great as a repeater when using it in client mode. I also tested connecting to the access point through the wired and wireless connections. The wired connection did not have any problems. The wireless connection, however, went in and out. It would connect, and then take an extremely long time (like 20+ minutes) before disconnecting. This AP usually takes about 2 minutes to connect from my router, which is why I thought the AP was having connection issues. After some testing, though, I found out that I could get the network to disconnect with about a 30-40 second timeout. After using a 30-40 second timeout, though, my network would eventually disconnect and I would have to wait awhile until it reconnects.
