In March 2019, Amazon, Microsoft and Ebay discovered that a hacker had dumped over 1 million records of email addresses and passwords for their customers who had used Sony's PlayStation Network (PSN) to login. The records included email addresses, passwords and answers to security questions. Sony reported in September that its investigation into the data breach was ongoing, and that it had the high-quality hacking tools that were used to perform the breach, and was contacting account holders directly to tell them of the breach and to offer them free one-time use codes for the online app Sony's PlayStation Network Account Security. Sony advised that credit card numbers or other personal information had not been accessed. Shortly after the breach of Sony Pictures it was revealed that Sony was unknowingly (and possibly illegally) infected with the Flame malware for a number of years. The malware was discovered by the Russian security firm Kaspersky Lab in 2014 and was said to have been active since 2007. In June 2016, Sony suffered a second breach, this time exposing user data from its gaming-related website Gamespot. The breach included data from its Sony Rewards loyalty scheme, with details including email addresses and usernames, and personal details including names, physical address and phone numbers. In September 2017, a publicly accessible Amazon S3 server held nearly a million IDs, passwords and cryptographic salts from the sony.com domain. The data held dated from 2004 to 2016. Public access to this server lead to cryptically encrypted passwords, PII, the salted passwords being cracked by a script allowing access to the plain text of these passwords. The server was owned and hosted by Jim Brock, a Sony shareholder. 5ec8ef588b
