with the release of the new warp stabilizer, it may be worth it to invest in a gimbal to avoid having to continually work in post-production. the warp stabilizer does a pretty good job with stabilization and you may find it is all you need. the "in a nutshell" video is a good example of the sort of video you can expect to get with these stabilized clips if you shoot them on a steady gimbal, its a big step up in terms of capability and ease of use in comparison to using the warp stabilizer plug-in for premiere pro. (more details available below.) there are two modes of operation: "view stabilizer" (alongside the six standard modes) and "deconverter." the normal modes have been broken down into six tabs: auto, vertical, horizontal, rotation lock, lens correction, and stretch (adding emphasis to those using a leica). the deconverter tab offers a variety of ways to apply warp stabilization. you can define how much detail and noise you want to leave in the original video clip as well as how high a tolerance of required camera stabilization. you can select from the normal modes or even allow the software to decide what mode to use. the software displays a green line that helps an operator determine the optimum region of a video clip to stabilize. when the camera moves, the line tells the operator how to position the mouse pointer to make sure that any camera motion is stabilized. the vertical, horizontal and rotation lock modes work very well and are ideal for stabilization of the area of the video where the camera is in motion. this is where the most improvement is obtained. the lens correction mode is useful for disambiguating lens distortion. the stretch mode does a very good job of counteracting camera jitter. 5ec8ef588b
