Shieh presented a review of the basic science, clinical science, and public health aspects of severe acute respiratory syndrome-related coronavirus infection. The review was presented at a plenary session during which other speakers discussed the current methods of coronavirus detection and the history of emerging infectious disease outbreak investigations. This report summarizes Dr. Shieh's review of the current knowledge about severe acute respiratory syndrome-related coronavirus infection. could be considered a critical period for the development of left ventricular diastolic dysfunction. During this critical period, the control of ventricular size and pressure may have enhanced ventricular compliance. Furthermore, it was reported that abnormal electrocardiogram changes including QT prolongation, T-wave inversion, or QT/QTc dispersion during the acute phase of AMI are predictors of cardiovascular events in AMI survivors \[[@b32-medscimonit-19-60]\]. A study reported that QT dispersion is an independent and significant predictor of cardiac death, recurrent non-fatal myocardial infarction, and rehospitalization for heart failure in AMI survivors \[[@b33-medscimonit-19-60]\]. The presence of QT prolongation and T-wave inversion during the acute phase of AMI could be related to left ventricular dysfunction, arrhythmias, and mortality \[[@b34-medscimonit-19 79a2804d6b
